Introduction

In 1970, Government Officials from Alaska, Yukon, Northwest Territories (NWT) and Federal Members of Parliament worked together to host the first Arctic Winter Games [AWG]. Further, contingents from Northern Alberta, Greenland, the Sapmi people of Northern Scandinavia and the Russian Province of Yamal now participate in the Games. The goal of the Games has remained the same over the years: to furnish the opportunity through sport, the social and cultural meeting of Northern peoples regardless of language, race, or creed.

The Games are held biennially usually during the month of March. Prior to the start of the Games, participating contingents will determine which athletes will be participating on their representative teams at the Games. Several teams have a selection process which is used to determine the composition of their teams for the Games. This process is conducted by holding regional trials and then territorial trials. The regional trials are normally held in November/December while the territorial trials are held in January, preceding the actual games.
Introduction

The AWG is designed to include the promotion of traditional aboriginal games based upon survival in the north. There are three categories of sports that are included in the games: major sports, northern sports (Inuit games, Dene games, snowshoeing, dog mushing, Inuit wrestling), and emerging/potential sports. Overall, in 2014 there were more than 18 different sporting events. The Games offer a venue where developing athletes from across the north meet to enhance their athletic skills and to share their respective cultures.

The International Committee for the Arctic Winter Games promotes the following mission (role/purpose) in the Games:

- Athletic Competition: “To involve as many athletes as possible either in the Games themselves or in the team trials - and to provide a forum of competition for those other than elite athletes with competitive opportunities in the south.”
- Cultural Exhibition & Social Interchange: “To promote indigenous cultural activities and exhibitions, and to get different groups together. To develop, amongst northern peoples, a geographic identity and to develop and maintain good relations.”
- Spirit of Fair Play: “The fundamental purpose is to encourage maximum participation by all ages of youth, cultures and walks of life in a broad range of athletic activities. The Games are to exemplify the spirit of fair play during the Games week.”
Introduction

In support of this three part mission; the Arctic Winter Games International Committee (AWGIC) promotes the following values of:

Cultural diversity awareness and understanding
Fair play
Access and equity
Integrity
Respect for self and others
Partnerships
Personal development
Community enhancement

In support of this three-part mission, the Arctic Winter Game supports the development of competent certified coaches who play a key role in promoting these values and operating principles. The games allow both male and female participants to improve their skills and develop personal values and traits that enhance their self-esteem and thus their ability to have success in other aspects of their lives.
Introduction

Overall, the findings of this study are very encouraging and give a strong rationale for the continued development, advancement, and support for the Arctic Winter Games. The results have been consistent with the aforementioned mission and values of the Games as established by the International Committee. This study is the fourth initial examination of the personal, social and community benefits of the Games. This research focused on the use of a questionnaire developed and tested in the 1998 Arctic Winter Games. Since then, this survey has been revised and updated on several occasions.

Importantly, the data is conclusive and provides a clear rationale for generating non-governmental organization (NGO), government and private support for future Arctic Winter Games. The Games do not take place in a vacuum. There appears to be very strong linkages to the need for community programs to support these young people prior to, during, and after the competitions. These programs are related to community development and social service issues as well as recreation and sport programs.
History

Background to the Study of Personal and Social Benefits

In 1969 three visionaries, Stuart Hodgson and James Smith, then Commissioners of Canada’s Northwest Territories and Yukon, and Governor Wally Hickel of Alaska recognized the need for unique northern competitions and cultural exchanges amongst the youth of the north. One year later (1970), government officials from Yukon, Northwest Territories, Federal Members of the Canadian Parliament, and Alaska worked together to sponsor the first Arctic Winter Games in Yellowknife, NT, taking place over roughly one week. Today, contingents from Greenland, Sapmi of northern Scandinavia, and the Russian Province of Yamalia, and now participate in the games. The goal of the games has remained the same over the years: to furnish the opportunity through sport, the social and cultural meeting of Northern peoples regardless of language, race, or creed. The games are restricted to youth of the circumpolar region of the arctic. The success of the Arctic Winter Games over the years has in large part been due to the clarity, specificity, and importance of the mission and goals of the games.
History

The Games are held biennially during the month of March, switching to a new location each time the Games are held. The various participating contingents prepare for the Games often times in their own ways. For example, several teams will hold regional trials and then final territorial trials in order to determine the composition of their Arctic Winter Games team, whereas other regions may not hold any sort of qualifying events for the Games. The opportunity to compete in the Games means that athletes come representing a wide range of communities. In the NWT alone, athletes in the regional, territorial and final Arctic Winter Games represent over 40 hamlets, towns, villages and communities. Most of the participants come from isolated communities. For the 2014 games, over 100 hamlets, towns, villages and communities from the arctic region were represented.
History

The Games are designed to promote traditional aboriginal games, sports and cultural activities based upon survival in the north. There are three categories of sports that are included in the Games: sports with wide participation (e.g. hockey, volleyball, soccer, cross country skiing), traditional northern sports (Arctic Sports which include Inuit and Dene games such as Alaskan high kick, wrestling), and emerging/potential sports (such as snowboarding, table tennis etc.). In the 2014 Arctic Winter Games in Fairbanks, Alaska, United States there were 18 different sporting events. The Games offer a venue where developing athletes from across the north meet to enhance their athletic skills, and to share their respective cultures.

The Arctic Winter Games International Committee (AWGIC) provides for coaches who promote the values and operating principles. These games allow both male and females to improve their skills and develop personal values and traits that enhance their ability to succeed in life. These values, taken in their entirety, constitute rationale and basis for extensive support from government, NGO’s and businesses. Specifically, involvement in the Games does suggest that a number of important social, personal and community benefits are realized.
The findings of this study are very encouraging and show strong rationale for the continued development and advancement of the Games. The findings of our research support the above-mentioned mission and values of the Games as established by the International Committee. The findings of this report validate the benefits of the Arctic Winter Games as noted in the publication “Arctic Winter Games – The History and Organization.” As this study was the second examination of the personal, social and community benefits of the Games, this research focused on the continued use of a meaningful questionnaire and was distributed to all participants and a small number of coaches in attendance for the Fairbanks Alaska Arctic Winter Games. This study was expanded to include the participants from all of the contingents, whereas the initial study, which was conducted over a six-year study period, collected data only from the contingents that could speak English and were from the Northwest Territories. Participants, for which English was not their primary language, were still given the opportunity to answer and respond to the questionnaire.
Importantly, the data provides a clear rationale for generating NGO, government and private support for the Arctic Winter Games. In addition, there appears to be very strong linkages to the need for community programs to support these young people prior to, during and after the competitions. These programs are related to community development and social service issues as well as recreation and sport programs. Specifically, that sport participation (training and competition) is a major feature in the lives of young people from all of the participating contingents at the Arctic Winter Games.
1. Athletic Competition: “To involve as many athletes as possible either in the Games or in the trials, and to provide a forum of northern sport competition.”

2. Cultural Exhibition & Social Interchange: “To promote indigenous cultural activities and exhibitions, to get different groups together, to develop and maintain good relations amongst northern people.”

3. Spirit of Fair Play: “To encourage maximum participation by all ages, and all walks of life in a broad range of athletic activity.”
Primary Research Questions

1. What is the most exciting or important thing about being here for the Games?
2. How has your life changed by being involved in the Games?
3. In what ways have the Games changed life for young people in your town/community?

The results show that there were consistent answers among all athletes, regardless of what team they were representing. Athletes, coaches and spectators representing the northern people seems to have similar beliefs and values. The following pages show selected answers to the above three questions from athletes, coaches and spectators, sectioned by team affiliation.
The 43rd bi-annual Arctic Winter Games were held in Fairbanks, Alaska, United States from Saturday, March 15, 2014 through Saturday, March 22, 2014. Participants from all over the Arctic North gathered in celebration of sport and community. Not only were athletic competitions held throughout the week, participants, coaches, and spectators were given the opportunity to be a part of cultural experiences from different regions. With almost 1,500 athlete participants, the Arctic Winter Games are becoming more popular among the people of the Arctic North.

Overview

Throughout the week of the Arctic Winter Games, March 15 – March 22, 2014, participants and coaches were given a survey that collected information regarding their participation in the Games. As already noted, there were three main goals of the Arctic Winter Games:

• Athletic Competition: “To involve as many athletes as possible either in the Games themselves or in the team trials - and to provide a forum of competition for those other than elite athletes with competitive opportunities in the south.”

• Cultural Exhibition & Social Interchange: “To promote indigenous cultural activities and exhibitions, and to get different groups together. To develop, amongst northern peoples, a geographic identity and to develop and maintain good relations.”

• Spirit of Fair Play “The fundamental purpose is to encourage maximum participation by all ages of youth, cultures and walks of life in a broad range of athletic activities. The Games are to exemplify the spirit of fair play during the Games week.”

The three goals were the basis for the questions on the survey. The four charts on the next three pages will visually show the percentage of participants and coaches to “agreed” and “strongly agreed” to each question.
